Review 'The rollicking, delightfully told tale of the creation of one of the most profound new technologies of our time.' Nicholas Thompson, editor-in-chief, Wired '[A] fast-moving tale of digital currency and its discontents.' (Kirkus Reviews) Read more Review 'The nineteenth and early twentieth centuries were ordered by the twin conceptions of mass and energy, and currencies were correspondingly massive forged from precious metals and wood pulp. The late-twentieth and twenty-first centuries have been ordered by information and computation, and money has become digital, cryptographic, and scattered across a light-speed network of circulating trust. In this fascinating book, Brian Patrick Eha describes the inventor-revolutionary-hackers who made Bitcoin a reality how they did it, the computing challenges they overcame, the vested interests they overturned, the laws that they broke, and the socio-technological reality that they are creating. This book is like a fiber-optic cable extending into our uncertain economic future.' David Krakauer, president and William H. Miller Professor of Complex Systems, Santa Fe Institute 'The sweeping, exhaustively researched and vividly painted story of a fascinating new form of financial technology, with a cast of characters worthy of a cyberpunk novel and enough drama and heartbreak to capture the imaginations of non-geeks.' Marc Hochstein, editor-in-chief, American Banker 'If Brian Patrick Eha can make me, a Luddite dunce, both understand and care about the enigmatic Bitcoin, and if he can also tantalize the novelist in me with a narrative of intellectual daring and primal risk relating to Bitcoins rise and fall and rise, then he is some kind of journalistic magician. And so he is, because he did all those things and more. Welcome to a new reality and the monetary future. You'll never find a better guide.'
